Foreword

One of the most indispensable parts of second language acquisition is vocabulary which may be sketchily defined as words in a language. An extensive knowledge of vocabulary can be attained through a mastery of morphology which is the branch of grammar that studies the structure or forms of words, primarily through the use of the morpheme construct. Morphemes are subdivided into two parts: free and bound morphemes. Free morphemes consist of lexical morphemes such as nouns, adjectives, verbs, and functional morphemes such as prepositions, articles, conjunctions, and pronouns. Bound morphemes are of two types: derivational and inflectional morphemes. English prefixes and suffixes are bound morphe hes that cannot stand alone. They change the meanings or the grammatical cate, ries of words.

To enhance their lexical knowledge and understand the medians of words, L2 students must know English prefixes and suffixes. One of the hurd is L2 students encounter when learning English lexical items is their law of knowledge of English affixes.

A Handbook of English Affixes contains essential africes, illustrated by some 1500 example sentences in English, described and explained in Persian.
