Preface

Two years ago I sent an email message to Professor Roger W. Shuy, one of the founding fathers in the new field of forensic linguistics, asking him many questions about forensic linguistics. After that, our email exchanges continued. He helped me very much. For example, the professor sent me some of his papers about this field and now I have a collection of his papers. He also posted me three of his best and newest books in this field as a gift and, as a result, I was able to write and defend my thesis in the best way. During our exchanges the professor also helped me to learn English as though I were one of his students in the U.S. He answered all of the questions I asked him almost every day very patiently, very kindly, completely, and in detail. I usually wrote about one topic every day and the professor corrected and checked them for me like a kind father.

After I received my degree, I was asked to teach English in Payam-e-Noor University. Again I asked the professor if he would continue to help me by answering my questions about the teaching materials I was using. Again the professor agreed and helped me as before. You may have noticed that most teachers tell their students that if they want to become proficient in English, they should be in an English speaking environment even if only for a short time. I have never been to the U.S. or any other English speaking country and as the professor wrote to me, I discovered that I needed to learn many things about that culture and language. In addition to the English language, I learned many things about their food, ceremonies, funerals, holidays, and many other things which you will see in the question/answer series that follows.

It seemed to me that it might be helpful to others who are learning English if I would share my questions and the professor's answers with them. The following questions and answers follow the structure of the teaching materials I used in my classes.

Some of these questions are very simple and sometimes you can find their answers in a dictionary, but I wanted to have all of these questions and answers as a collection. When I asked him questions, the professor helped me every time and as a result of these exchanges, I improved my own writing and cultural knowledge. The following is a collection of all of my questions, unit by unit, which were also corrected by the professor. I continued to send questions about my entire book to him, part by part, and he gave me some new ideas and even provided some answers that I didn't know.
