Introduction

A man, without a woman looking after him, is handicapped.

The Reason for Composing This Book

The recent edition of my book "Why We Become Sick" was welcomed by many people, and received wide attention by the press, especially the chapter entitled "Being a Mother or a Minister." Presently, many mothers seem to have forgotten their social responsibilities, and are attracted towards outdoor careers. This article, which addresses this very problem, drew so much attention that one of the press editors invited me to write my opinions about the duties of women in society, and the tasks to which nature has appointed them.

This book contains a series of articles which were written about women in the world. Some of these articles have appeared in serial weekly magazines.

In a period in which women, who have been changed to mere objects and corrupted by society to believe in a life of sensuality, have given up their essential moral obligations. They blindly follow fashion, try to achieve a luxurious life, and obtain masculine careers or, in other words, mistakingly try to prove their equality tasks. They are willing to accept men's responsibilities and forget their own duties. The press and sociologists should not allow relatively significant matters to be hidden, and must not assist women to achieve such cheap, worthless goals. On the contrary, they must make them realize that wearing men's clothing or accepting their responsibilities does not gain them their true character, but rather spoils their invaluable nature.

Obviously, "sensuality" does not mean sexual instincts because the latter exists in all human beings to a certain degree, according to their creation. However, other instincts such as ambition, selfishness, self-display, animation, and imperfect education, etc. adversely influence human beings' character and seduce them.

Definitely one who has forgotten his psychological needs and has occupied himself with other tasks develops sickness. The current increase in emotionally related ailments proves such a claim.

Do not forget that whatever you read in this book is not meant to show disapproval of women. This book has not been written to prevent women from obtaining education nor illuminating their minds. By composing this book I do not intend to lower the status of women, but to honor it. What I mean is that women should consider the meaning of "honor" more precisely.

I believe that man's decorating of women in an offensive manner, displaying them in social gatherings and encouraging them to follow noxious desires is not honoring them. Allowing women to perform masculine tasks is not honoring them either.

I believe that the real position of a woman is in the glorious state of motherhood. If a man views his wife as being a mother who educates other men to meet all women with the same respect, not only will these childish temptations be unnecessary, but also he wouldn't allow her to waste even a second of her time on something other than motherhood.

I believe if a woman knows enough about the position of motherhood, recognizes her own responsibilities and conforms with them, her position will not only be superior to every man, but will also not be degraded by him. In addition, she will enjoy greater spiritual and physical health.

The main reason for composing this book is to honor and stabilize the position of women. This book was written for the purpose of educating women in order that they may perform this respectable and significant task more perfectly.

The chapters of this book indicate that God and destiny have honored human beings by giving them capable mothers, and have provided them with all necessary means to achieve this task.

With the hope of having more responsible mothers in every society.
